Coffee Culture.

WE are glad to perceive that more attention is being directed to this subject, and that there is a fair prospect of success, where the proper locality is selected. A gentleman, on Hawaii, leased during the present year, a tract of 1,000 acres of coffee land, and has found a large number (some thousands) of coffee trees growing on it, which, after care and protection from animals, promise to pay the expenses of the place after the second year. Two conditions must be observed in coffee culture here-proper elevation and shade. The more we learn of coffee culture in this and other countries the more we are satisfied that blight can only be prevented by securing an elevation of at least 1,500 to 2,000 feet above the sea, and by planting among trees. In an exchange we find the following description of the mode of cultivation in Cordova, Mexico, which is an elevated district of that country. The directions will apply here as well: "The send or grain, which should be selected with care, is usually planted in well-prepared beds in a nursery, shaded from the sen. The young plants are transplanted at the age of one year or eighteen months old to the felds or enjectes, which are the noughly cleanted of all undergrowth and the soil well prepared. As the joung plants are very tender, it is necessary to protest them from the son. For this reason open forests are used where available, and the mountain sides affording shade are utilized for coffee plantations. In open fields a grawing shade must be created, which is most thickly obtained by planting banana trees, also yielding some profit from their fruit. But the best entitivatory consider this a poor substitute. One of the most infalligent planters has set out in his coffee fields a large number of cinchons trees (from which quisites is obtained), which grows well in that initiaties: also valuable timber trees, as "The send or grain, which should be selected with started in the field, this is not required; and the better class of planters give careful attention to proming, keeping the plant or tree at the height of from his to eight feet, although if unchecked it will grow to double that height. The frees do not yield their full blossening at one time. The first flowering is sometimes as early as December, the second about February, and the third and most aboundant the last of March and the month of April. The flower falls, hearing a round green berry, which ripens is seven or eight months, changing when ripe into a red color. Each fully formed berry contains uso grains, though sometime it contains only one grains, which is rounded or aval shaped.
